An extension of the research program will be to explore why the cerebellum has been so little studied. Why has the role of the cerebellum been downplayed in psychology? Why has the role of the cerebellum been downplayed in cognitive and memory research? Why has the cerebellum been downplayed in emotion research? One useful way of answering these questions is to ask, "Why has this been downplayed in our own research program?" The proposed research will examine the reasons for the downplaying of the cerebellum in the past and the reasons for recent reconsideration of its importance. It will also examine the issues at stake in studying the cerebellum, and it will suggest ways of overcoming difficulties in conducting research. Topics which will be explored include: The role of the cerebellum in motor and cognitive and emotion functions. Concepts of the cerebellum which are potentially misleading. The relative advantage of modeling the cerebellum from computational and neurophysiological perspectives. Our own methodological problems. The question of cerebellar participation in each of the functions mentioned above. The question of the cerebellum's influence on the brain as a whole. The question of a cerebellar role in psychopathology. The question of a cerebellar contribution to the brain's control of behavior. To gain better understanding of how people process risk communication messages in their context. People aged 17-65 from three groups (a student sample, n=178; a service user sample, n=283; and a general public sample, n=326) completed an online survey with eight risk messages that varied in perceived risk, perceived severity, sources of information and moral hazard issues. These risk messages were evaluated by (1) participants' likert-scale scores on risk perception, severity and importance; (2) objective risk assessment (i.e. the likert scale scores of the health risk in the messages); (3) these objective risk assessment scores in combination with moral hazard; and (4) participants' responses on their importance of the health risks included in the messages and on their support of interventions to be enacted in the future. Participants' median risk perception scores were lower for more advanced risk messages. Likert-scale scores for perceived severity were significantly lower for two out of the three risk messages that described scenarios with worse outcomes compared to the control message. The most likely source of information was the media for the three risk messages that mentioned media information. The most important messages were those about vaccines. Interventions for risk communications were deemed important by more than 70% of respondents. Specifically, people were less willing to accept the health risks included in advanced risk messages. People perceived severe health risks more critically and had less trust in the message's source than when they considered the more accessible risk messages. Nonetheless, people preferred some of the more explicit risk messages when compared to the control message. 3.28 0.16 3.33 3a67dffec
